FOUNDING OF A FORT

On the level land near the junction of the Laramie and North Platte Rivers stands Fort Laramie. It was long a landmark and symbol of the Old West. Situated at a strategic point on a natural route of travel, the site early attracted the attention of trail blazing fur trappers. They established the first fort. In later years it offered protection and refreshment to the many who made the great western migrations over the Oregon Trail. It was a station for the Pony Express and the Overland Stage. It served as an important base in the conquest of the Plains Indians. It saw the development of the open range cattle. Then the coming of the homesteaders, and the final settlement which marked the closing of the frontier. You just can't get a true picture of the Old West without knowing Fort Laramie.

American and French Canadian fur traders and trappers, exploring the land, travelled the North Platte Route for over two decades before the original fort was established at the mouth of the Laramie River. First to mention the well-wooded stream flowing into the North Platte River from the southwest was Robert Stuart. He was leader of the seven Astorians who made a historic trip during the winter of 1812-13. They journeyed eastward over what was to become the greatest roadway to the West thus entitling them to recognition as the discoverers of the Oregon Trail.

Records of actual fur trade activity in this area for the next 10 years are extremely meager. But many geographical names bear witness to the gradual westward movement of the beaver hunters. Some of them were undoubtedly of Canadian origin. Among them was Jacques La Ramee, who according to tradition, was killed by Indians in 1821 on the stream which now bears his name, and which was destined to become the setting of Fort Laramie. Famous only in death, his name was to be given also to a plains region, a peak, a mountain range, a town, a city, and a county in Wyoming.

In 1823, Jim Bridger, Jedediah Smith, and other enterprising trappers of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, going overland from the upper Missouri, rediscovered South Pass, and the lush beaver country west of the Continental Divide. In 1824 while taking furs back to "the states," a band of "mountain men" under Thomas Fitzpatrick became the first Americans of record to pass the mouth of the Laramie after the Astorians.

For 15 years thereafter the St. Louis traders sent supply trains up the North Platte route to the annual trappers' rendezvous usually held in the valleys of the Green or Wind Rivers. In 1830, William Sublette, with supplies for the rendezvous on the Wind River, took the first wagons over the greater part of what was to become the Oregon Trail. The Laramie and its tributaries were also the homes of the prized beaver, and much trading was done at the pleasant campsites near its mouth. There, too, was the junction of the trappers' trail to Taos.

The advantages of the site were readily apparent to William Sublette and Robert Campbell. In 1834 they paused en route to the annual trappers' rendezvous to launch construction of log-stockaded Fort William. This fort, named Sublette, was the first fort on the Laramie. In 1835, Sublette and Campbell sold Fort Williams to Jim Bridger, Thomas Fitzpatrick and Milton Sublette. A year later these men in turn sold their interests to the American Fur Company.

To an artist, A. J. Miller, we are indebted for the only known pictures of Fort William. Made during his visit to the fort in 1837, these paintings show a typical log stockade which his notes describe further as being:

" . . . of quadrangular form, with block houses at diagonal corners to sweep the fronts in case of attack. Over the front entrance is a large block house in which is placed a cannon. The interior of the fort is about 150 feet square, surrounded by small cabins whose roofs reach within 3 feet of the top of the palisades against which they abut. The Indians encamp in greater numbers here 3 or 4 times a year. Bringing peltries to be exchanged for dry goods, tobacco and alcohol. The Indians have a mortal horror of the "big gun" which rests in the blockhouse. They have had experience of its prowess and witnessed the havoc produced by its loud 'talk'. They conceive of it to be only asleep and have a wholesome dread of its being woke up."

The fur traders came to be more and more dependent upon the fort on the Laramie as a base of supplies and a refuge in time of trouble. Similarly, early travelers and missionaries found it a most welcome haven in the wilderness. In 1840, the famous Father de Smet paused at this "Fort La Ramee" where he was favorably impressed by a village of Cheyennes. Late in 1840 or early 1841, a rival trading post appeared. This was Fort Platte, built of adobe on the nearby banks of the North Platte, by L. P. Lupton, a veteran of the fur trade in what is now Colorado.

Abandonment of the rendezvous system after 1840 increased the importance of fixed trading posts. The deterioration of Fort William prompted the American Fur Company to replace it in 1841 with a more pretentious adobe-walled post which cost some $10,000, a lot of money in those days! It was called Fort John, presumably after John Sarpy, a stockholder. The new fort, like the old one, was popularly known as "Fort Laramie."

Trade goods for the rival posts came out in wagons over the Platte Valley road from St. Joseph or over the trail from Fort Pierre on the upper Missouri. On the return trip, packs of buffalo robes and furs were sent down to St. Louis. In addition to wagon transportation, cargoes were sent by boat down the fickle Platte, which often dried up and left the boatmen stranded on sandbars in the middle of the Nebraska.

Up to 1840, traders, adventurers, and missionaries dominated the scene. The first party of true covered wagon emigrants paused at Fort Laramie in 1841. The following year Lt. John C. Fremont visited the fort on his first exploring trip to the Rocky Mountains. Recognizing its strategic location and foreseeing the covered wagon migrations, Fremont added his voice to those recommending the establishment of a military post at the site.

More than 3,000 Oregon-bound emigrants paused at the fort in 1845 intermingling peacefully with the numerous Sioux Indians encamped there. Later that summer, peace still prevailed when Col. Stephen Watts Kearney arrived with five companies of the First Dragoons. They encamped on the grassy Laramie River bottoms and held a formal council with the Indians between the two forts.

Here the Indians were warned against drinking "Taos Lightning or disturbing the emigrants. And they were assured of the love and solicitude of the Great White Father. They were also duly impressed with his power as symbolized in a display of howitzer fire and rockets.

While Fort Platte was abandoned by its owners in 1845, trade was brisk at Fort Laramie during the winter of 1845-6. It is recorded that during the following spring a little fleet of Mackinaw boats successfully navigated the Platte. They carried 1,100 packs of buffalo robes, 110 packs of beaver, and 3 packs of bear and wolf skins.

For some years, the Government had considered the establishment of Military posts along the Oregon trail for the protection of emigrants. And this site at the mouth of the Laramie had often been recommended. In December 1845 such action was proposed by President Polk. And in May 1846, Congress approved "An Act to provide for raising a regiment of Mounted Riflemen and for establishing military stations on the route to Oregon." Funds were provided to mount and equip the troops, to defray the expenses of each station, and to compensate the Indian tribes on whose lands these stations might be erected.

The Mexican War delayed the projected building of forts on the Oregon Trail. But in 1847 a battalion of the Missouri Mounted Volunteers was recruited. Early in 1848 this battalion established Fort Kearney, the first of the posts on the trail. It was on the south bank of the Platte, near the head of Grand Island. During the following winter the news of the discovery of gold in California was published throughout the land, and the resulting fevered preparations to trek westward the next spring increased the urgency of completing the chain of forts.

In March, Gen. D. E. Triggs at St. Louis was directed to carry out the establishment of the second post "at or near Fort Laramie, a trading station belonging to the American Fur Company." Lt. Daniel P. Woodbury, of the Corps of Engineers was authorized to purchase the buildings of Fort Laramie, "should he deem it necessary to do so."

And so this was done. And in a certain sense, a military fort was born. The West was still young and a lot of things were going to happen, and Fort Laramie would be famous in fact as well as in fiction.
